Business and industry

New city industry really makes things shine — religiously!

It was seven years ago that a glow in the murky waters of a breaker pond near Russell Park created an international stir.

Seven years later an industrial plant near that pond is creating objects which, literally, glow as the sun's rays strike them.

The plant, NORFIB, creates fiberglass objects which are heginning to adon the exterior of area churches.

These are the shiny golden domes and crosses which glisten during daylight hours. Spokesman Joe Martines noted that the husiness, open since April, had its grand opening in June.

The building which houses the industry is a 7,500-square foot concrete block structure.

Making molds

The first step in the business is the making of molds.

This is done by creating a wooden framed mold. Or, in the case of trim and window trames, by making molds out of the old metal trim and I rames.

The molds are taken into a fiberglass spraying youn.

There the molds are sprayed with resin and distributed as paint of the mold. One is 10 feet high and weights about 250 pounds. The other one is slightly smaller. One is 10 feet high and weights about 250 pounds. The company also takes complete charge of putting up the items.

While the company now employes only about four people inside, it employes masons, roofers, and other artisans for outside-the-plant work.

Advantage

This is an advantage, Martines said, for the local plant.

There the molds are sprayed with resin and distributed as particular that there is not another company around the threat plant there are in that there is not another company around the public of a public of a public of a public plant the mold is gone over with a slicion-based glue.
